Like the old oak that hath withstood The gathering storms of rolling years, Though tough, and gnarled, yet it is good; The woodnan at its root appears, And chooses it from all the rest, For 'tis the firmest and the best.

Thus, 'mid the hardy sons of men, From this and that we turn away;

Where right and wrong stand face to face The weak for right the contest wage, Behold a giant in his place-Stand where mad mobs in fury rage,

Yes, where the tyrant rules the land,

Where Afric's tawny sons are bound,

Where Anglo Saxon dare not stand And blow the Gospel's purest sound, Where truth strives hard, yet can't prevail, Where error conquers to the last, Where iron hearts would seem to quail,

Brave Cassius' words rise o'er the blast. Yes, hear him to the tyrant speak, With burning words and righteous ire How dare you thus pursue the weak,

With ready cannon, sword and fire? You may drive them to a dack ravine, Or to a cold, untimely grave; A gathering host will still be seen-

The Union's flag will o'er them wave. On to the conflict, if you will; Pursue your victim, if you choose; For right, the hosts will gather still, And wrong, at last, the field will lose.

This is the battle of the free; It may be fierce—it may be long; Kindle this flame from sea to sea. And yet it will be right 'gainst wrong.

What can this vile committee do? I stand for right-God stands for me. Republicans! I stand for you: Yours is the banner of the free. If tyrants dare this land divide, We'll conquer-God is on our side.

Yes, woodman, there's the sturdy tree, To bear the banner of the free, And bear it right, for freedom's sake. Give us this man to lead the way-This noble, lion-hearted Clay.
